

Living Quest: Maintaining Spiritual Integrity

Quest is a dynamic process in which everyone involved has opportunities to practice being present to themselves and each other and to find support in discovering what it can mean to live from a place of spiritual integrity. Being able to see this modeled through the words, actions, and presence of facilitators, the spiritual program director, minister, and mentors throughout the Quest experience is a powerful way to support and honor participants on their journeys.

When those responsible for holding Quest (spiritual program director, minister, facilitators, mentors, and steering committee members) choose to bring spiritual integrity to all aspects of Quest both with participants and in activities that do not involve participants directly, the entire Quest process is enhanced. Also, there is a far greater likelihood that those in leadership roles feel supported as they go about fulfilling their responsibilities. Resilience and trust are enhanced, so that when challenges arise, those holding Quest can better work together to be present to the challenge and reach shared understanding about how to proceed. Participants benefit through becoming aware (either on a conscious or a subconscious level) that those helping to guide them in their journey are truly present and represent a collective whole.

For many congregations, this practice of bringing spirituality and spiritual integrity into all aspects of a program (meetings, passing conversations, email, and other correspondence) may be a new way of “doing business.” With full days and busy schedules, it is easy to develop a pattern of rushing through things and being less attentive to process. Bringing congruency between how we are with those not participating in Quest and how we are when with participants has the potential to be a powerful spiritual journey for those responsible for the holding of Quest.
